THE LANGUAGE OF APPOINTMENT TO OFFICES AND ROLES IN SCRIPTURE

Abstract

Verbs used in the Old Testament and New Testament for the appointment of people to a whole gamut of human offices and roles are identified and their used throughout the canon is then studied to clarify what the language actually implies for ceremonies of instalment to office today. Potential ceremonial acts considered include the laying on of the hand(s), anointing with oil, causing the appointee to stand, filling the hand, and stretching the hand toward the candidate. Attention is given to the significance in understanding installation of verbs of giving, placement, sanctification, and making. There is no biblical basis for a distinction between ordination and commissioning, and certainly no basis for separating ceremonies of instalment from the actual commencement of a ministry or role.

Clearly people are appointed to specific offices and roles in Scripture. However, the question remains, do the ceremonies involved in such an appointment ever constitute ordination in the traditional sense, or is something else happening?

The King James Version uses the verb "to ordain" with reference to the appointment of priests to the service of idols (2 Kgs 23:5; 2 Chron 11:15) and to the appointment of the high priest to the service of God (Heb 5:1; 8:3). It also uses "to ordain" with reference to the appointment of Jeremiah as a prophet (Jer 1:5); to the appointment of the twelve (Mark 3:14, 15; Acts 1:21, 22); to Paul's appointment as a preacher, apostle, and teacher (1 Tim 1:27); and to Titus's appointment of elders in every city (Titus 1:5). On the surface these facts may seem sufficient to settle the debate. However, it is no secret that King James was insistent the Version he authorized retain traditional ecclesiastical titles. Even if we could be sure that the translators intended to speak of ordination here in a technical sense, that fact would hardly settle the issue of what the Bible writers themselves intended.

The methodology adopted here has been to identify the verbs used in the Old Testament and New Testament for the appointment of people to a whole gamut of human offices and roles then to study the use of these words in the canon to clarify what the language actually implies. The approach has been inductive and comprehensive. However, for the sake of the reader the whole study is not presented here, just the conclusions.

Biblical Terminology for Installation into Office or Role

The study begins with terminology involving physical imagery that may indicate actual ceremonies connected with installation to office. It then moves on to the discussion of more general terminology.

Terminology Tied in with Installation Ceremonies

The section considers the practice of the laying on of the hand(s), a ceremony accompanying installation into office in both the Old Testament and New Testament. It then looks at anointing, a ceremony accompanying installation in the Old Testament but not in the New Testament. Causing an appointee to stand is part of Old Testament ceremonial on at least one occasion and may still have value today. It is unclear to what extent the filling of the hand of Old Testament priests was a live or a dead metaphor but it does have potential as a part of Christian installation ceremony today. It is unclear whether appointment by the stretching forth of the hand in either Testament was a dead metaphor or a literal practice in appointment ceremonies. However, it likewise has potential as a part of Christian installation ceremony today.

The Laying on of the Hand(s)

Moses lays his hand on Joshua as a sign of the transfer of authority (Num 27:18-20). In the New Testament the delegation of authority is evident in the laying on of the hand upon deacons and the laying on of the hand(s) upon elders (Acts 6:4-6; 1 Tim 4:15; 5:22). This practice is an extension of the laying on of the hand upon new believers (Acts 8:17; Heb 6:1). The use of laying on of the hand upon all believers challenges the idea that it can be limited to a particular group of believers. There is no distinction between commissioning and ordination here. Nor is there any delay between appointment to the task or office and the laying on of the hand. If a person is called to the work, the laying on of the hand(s) is appropriate. Blessing and privilege as well as authority are conveyed by the laying on of the hand (e.g., Gen 48:12-20).

So the LORD said to Moses, “Take Joshua son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit of leadership, and lay your hand on him. Have him stand before Eleazar the priest and the entire assembly and commission him in their presence. Give him some of your authority so the whole Israelite community will obey him (Num 27:18-20)."

Responsibility is being transferred when Moses lays his hand on Joshua and ceremonially appoints him as his successor (Num 27:18). Moses is said to be giving a portion of his hōd or authority to Joshua so that the entire congregation of the children of Israel may hear or listen to him (cf. Deut 34:9).

The significance of the laying on of the hand for the transfer of authority becomes clearer as we examine the function of the laying on of the hand throughout the Old Testament as a whole. The laying on of the hand can be an act of violent intrusion into the body space of another (e.g., Gen 22:12; 37:22). It is done to sacrificial animals, apparently as a transfer of sin to the animal (e.g., Lev 4:1-4). In a case of blasphemy, all who heard a man curse are commanded to lay hands on his head before the entire congregation stone him (Lev 24:14). The words follow, "When one curses, his God, (s)he will carry his own sin" (Lev 24:15). The idea appears to be that by coming forward as witnesses, the hearers have absolved themselves of any responsibility attached to the man's sin. Is the forced intimacy of the hand-laying a way of making potentially false accusers take stock? In any case, it is more precisely responsibility for sin that is here being transferred to the accused, rather than sin itself.

Delegation of responsibility and the granting of privilege come to the fore in Jacob's blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh, with the right hand on one and the left on the other (Gen 48:12-20).

Delegation of authority is evident in the way the appointment of deacons is seen as freeing up the apostles for prayer and ministry of the word (Acts 6:4). Timothy's installation as an elder is in view when Paul instructs him not to neglect the gift given to him with the laying on of hands of the eldership (1 Tim 4:15) and his installation of other elders would appear to be in view when Paul warns him against laying hands on anyone too quickly (1 Tim 5:22). The apostles pray over the church's first deacons and lay hands on them (Acts 6:6).

In the New Testament, elders and deacons are not the only object of the laying on of hands. In Acts 8:17, Peter and John lay hands on the Samaritan converts and these converts receive the Holy Spirit, suggesting part of a ceremony of dedication of new believers. In Heb 6:1, it is listed with the foundational matters of repentance, faith, baptism, resurrection, and eternal judgment, suggesting that it happened with all believers. The laying on of hands for elders and deacons would be an extension of this initial installation as Christians, and would consistently apply to instalment into and other offices and roles, as the need arises.

No mere symbolism is involved in the laying on of hands in Acts 8:17. Without divorcing the efficacy of the ceremony from the faith it expresses, a real transformation takes place; to the extent that Simon offers money so that he may also have the power to convey the spirit through the laying on of hands (Acts 8:18, 19). Peter roundly rejects Simon's suggestion (vss. 18-24).

4 Note how Yahweh himself likewise gives unparalleled hōq̄ to Solomon (1 Chron 29:25).

5 A more literal rendering than the NIV's "Anyone who curses their God will be held responsible."

6 That real spiritual power is seen as in some way conveyed by the laying on of hands is confirmed by its use in miraculous healings, as in Matt 9:18; Mark 5:23; 16:18.
Anointing the Appointee

Priests, kings, prophets, and proclaimers of good news are anointed to their tasks in the Old Testament. The titles "Messiah" and "Christ" refer to the anointing of Jesus. Anointing as a ceremony of installation is absent from the New Testament. The language of anointing stresses the initiative of divine grace.

The verb מָשֵׁךְ, "to anoint," is frequently used of appointment to a particular office and roles. Priests are anointed, as are kings, prophets (1 Kgs 19:16), and promulgators of good news (Isa 61:1). The cognate noun, מָשִׁיךְ ("anointed one"), has come into English with reference to the ultimate davidic king as "Messiah."

The Greek equivalent of מָשִׁיךְ, Χριστός, has likewise come into English with reference to Jesus as "Christ" and is cognate to ("I anoint") and χρίσμα ("anointing"). Jesus applies χρίσεω to himself when he speaks of the Spirit having anointed him to proclaim good news (Luke 4:16). It is God who has anointed Jesus (Acts 4:27; 10:38; Heb 1:9) and who has anointed believers as well (2 Cor 1:21). The anointing of the Holy One brings knowledge in 1 John 2:20, 27.

In Old Testament times anointing was no mere metaphor. Actual oil was used often enough. Nor was it used in any small measure. In Aaron's installation, it is said to have run upon the head, down the beard, and down on the edge of his garments (Ps 133:2). In the New Testament, oil was apparently never used in ceremonies of installation into Christian office, perhaps because the sanctuary on earth was no longer in focus. The language does not therefore directly inform any ordination ceremony. However, it does stress the divine call behind installation to office or service. Where ceremony does occur, it is at the beginning of office.

Since priesthood and kingship were hereditary, the act of anointing was ever and always an act of initial grace, never a reward or recognition for work well done.

Causing the Appointee to Stand

9Exod 29:5-7; Lev 8:10-12, 30; 10:7; 21:10, 12 1 Sam 16:13; Ps 89:20.

10Although the New Testament contains instruction for elders to use it during prayers for the sick (James 5:14). However, this act may have had as much to do with the perceived curative properties of the oil as with any supposed special spiritual significance.

11Indeed even in Old Testament times, Ps 133 suggests that unity was well on the way to operating as a functional substitute for the oil in times when the temple was not operational. See Elie Assis, "Family and Community as Substitutes for the Temple after Its Destruction: New Readings in Psalm 127 and 133," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 85 (2009): 55-62.
The Old and New Testaments alike speak of appointees to various offices being "made to stand." Moses had Joshua literally stand before the people when he appointed him as his successor. Where an appointee to office can stand, it may remain to this day a rich symbol of readiness to serve.

The Hiph’il of the verb ‘md ("stand") is frequently used with reference to the appointment of priests and Levites to office. Priests are made to In two passages, the Hebrew word translated in the KJV as "ordin" is a Hiph’il of ‘md, or "stand," conveying the idea of causing people to stand. The Greek verb kathistēmi is a compound variation of the verb histēmi, "stand," and is used in Hebrews for the appointment of the high priest (Heb 5:1; 8:3). Standing is the appropriate posture for a priest or temple assistant, ready to serve at a moment's notice, although the characteristic posture of Jesus as high priest is sitting, his atoning work finished in a way an earthly high priest's could never be. Of course, his followers serving him on earth today have a work before them that is not yet finished (Heb 1:3, 13; 10:12).

The Hiph’il of ‘md is also used of appointment of Joshua as Moses' successor (Num 17:22), of appointment to the office of king (1 Chron 17:14), of advancement in princely office (2 Chron 11:22), of appointment as a eunuch to serve a queen (Esther 4:5), of the installation of judges (2 Chron 19:5), and of the raising of an army (Dan 11:11, 13), and appointment to serve under a military commander (2 Chron 25:5).

The verb kathistēmi is used with reference to the appointment of the faithful and wise servant over his master's household, who is subsequently given authority over all the master's goods (Matt 24:45, 47; Luke 12:42, 44). Appointment to wider responsibility is likewise in focus in the parable of the talents in Matt 25:21, 23. It is used with reference to the appointment of an arbitrator or judge with authority over another (Luke 12:14; Acts 7:27, 35) and with reference to the appointment of the first Christian deacons (Acts 6:3). It is likewise used of Pharaoh appointing Joseph over his household and over Egypt (Acts 7:10), of Titus' appointment of elders in Crete, and of God giving human beings authority over creation (Heb 2:7).

Obviously the idea of "causing to stand" applies to a wide variety of roles, not all strictly priestly. In Num 17:22 it is no dead metaphor. Moses apparently literally stands Joshua up before the people. Where an appointee to office can stand, it remains an appropriate symbol in any appointment ceremony of the readiness of the appointee to serve.

The Filling of the Hand

The "filling" of the hand is an expression often used in the Old Testament to refer to the consecration of priests. It may have been a dead metaphor. However, placing emblems of grace in the hand of a person being installed to Christian office may be a rich symbol indeed.

When priests are symbolically installed in office, the Hebrew often speaks of the "filling" [ml'] of the hand of the priest. The idea appears to be that of provision for the priest to do his work. The special dress and anointing of priests are described in Exod 29:5-9 and the statement is made, "And thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons," says the King James Version, or more literally, "You will fill the hand of Aaron and the hand of his sons" (vs. 9).\[^{13}\]

The expression may have been a dead metaphor. However, Christian ceremonies installing people to office may be significantly enriched by the placing in the hand of the candidate of gifts of grace, such as the word of Scripture.

The Stretching of the Hand

The "stretching of the hand" is closely related to the "laying on of the hand(s)." It signifies acting in power, delegation of authority, and commitment into divine care, and sometimes involves roles rather than offices. The stretching forth of a hand by community members in installation ceremonies would be a ceremonial practice reflecting the element of community support implicit in 2 Cor 8:19.

The stretching out of the hand is a Hebrew idiom, indicating acting in power, whether to deliver (e.g., Exod 3:20) and/or to destroy.\[^{14}\] It is particularly involves commissioning a prophet to speak: "Then the LORD reached out his hand and touched my mouth and said to me, I have put my words in your mouth" (Jer 1:9). The Greek verb for stretching the hand, cheirotoneō, is twice used in the New Testament to describe appointment to offices and roles emphasizes delegated authority to act:

Paul and Barnabas appointed elders for them in each church and, with prayer and fasting, committed them to the Lord, in whom they had put their trust (Acts 14:23)

What is more, he [Titus] was chosen by the churches to accompany us as we carry the offering, which we administer in order to honor the Lord himself and to show our eagerness to help (2 Cor 8:19).

Acts 14:23 indicates commitment into the care of God is a related symbolism of the word. 2 Cor 8:19 indicates that the focus is sometimes on a specified role rather than on an ecclesiastical office.

As my colleague Wendy Jackson has pointed out to me the question must be asked, was the stretching out of the hand in these instances a dead metaphor? In other words, does cheirotoneō simply denote (s)election without any particular accompanying ceremony of the hand? Perhaps. Nevertheless, services of installation might be enriched by members of the congregation lifting up a hand to show support for the person being installed to an office or role and to affirm that person acts on the community's behalf.

General Terminology of Installation

\[^{13}\] So also the Hebrew behind the verb "consecrate" is literally "fill the hand" in Exod 28:41; 29:33; Lev 8:33; 16:32; Judg 17:5, 12; 1 Kgs 13:33; and 1 Chron 29:5. Cf. the passive "was consecrated" in Lev 21:10.

\[^{14}\] Exod 9:15; 1 Sam 24:6; 10; 24:6, 10; 26:9, 11, 23; 2 Sam 1:14; 18:12; Job 1:11, 12; 2:5; 30:24; Ps 55:20; 138:7; Dan 11:42.
We now turn to other Hebrew and Greek verbs used to denote installation to office, verbs that do not appear to denote ceremony at all, but broaden our understanding of what appointment involves. This section examines in turn the language of appointment to office as gift, the language of placement in office, the language of sanctification or separation, and the language of appointment as "making."

The Language of Appointment as Gift

Those who are appointed to an office or task not only receive gifts of enablement. They are themselves also a gift to God's people.

The Hebrew verb ntn is usually translated as "give" in English. However, it can also refer to the setting of objects in space, e.g., of the greater and lesser lights in the firmament on the fourth day (Gen 1:17) or of the rainbow in the cloud (Gen 9:13). By extension, it can refer to the metaphoric placement of people in particular roles or offices, such as with the appointment of (false) priests in 2 Kgs 23:12 and as with the appointment of Jeremiah as prophet in Jer 1:5. The gift aspect of the verb may not apply in every instance, but particularly comes to the fore in the notion of Yahweh giving the Levites to help the priests (Num 8:19; 18:6; cf. 1 Chron 6:48) and of David appointing temple servants to the same end (Ezra 8:20; cf. Jer 29:26; Ezek 44:14). This is in line with the New Testament concept of particular roles and offices as gifts to the church bestowed in consequence of her Lord's exaltation (Eph 4:7-13). The verb is especially applied to the appointment of kings, including the elevation of the king as the divine firstborn (Ps 89:27). It is used to speak of the appointment of the prince of Tyre as covering cherub (Ezek 2:8:14), the stationing of garrisons (2 Chron 17:2), and the appointment of deliverers in time of oppression (Neh 9:27).

The use of ntn in the context of appointment to ecclesiastical office emphasizes the wide range of offices and roles that may be involved, and celebrates the way that those fulfilling these offices and roles are a divine gift to the community.

The Language of Placement in Office

The Hebrew verb śym ("place") denotes action under authority. On the other hand, the use of the Greek verb tithēmi (also "place") emphasizes that divine calling comes from God. It denotes the diversity of the gifts that God has ordained in the church.

The Hebrew verb śym ("place") is used usually with reference to setting someone above something or someone else, i.e., placing that person in a position of authority over the other. Pharaoh makes Joseph ruler of his household (Ps 105:21), and suggests that Joseph place one of his family over the royal livestock (Gen 47:6). A Hebrew slave asks who has made Moses ruler and judge over them (Exod 2:14). Pharaoh sets taskmasters over the Israelites (Exod 1:11; 5:14), and Jethro urges Moses to set officials over the people to settle their disputes (Exod 18:21). Military commanders are likewise set over their troops (1 Sam 8:11; 18:5; 19:15; Deut 17:15; 1 Sam 12:13; 1 Kgs 10:9; 2 Chron 9:8; Neh 13:26.)
Yahweh promises to set David's hand "over the sea," i.e., in a position of authority (Ps 89:25). Leaders are set over individual tribes (Deut 1:13), judges are set for the nation (1 Sam 8:11; 2 Sam 15:4), and leaders, princes, and kings are set over people (1 Kgs 10:9), sometimes at the insistence of the people themselves (Deut 17:14, 15; Judg 11:11; 1 Sam 10:19). The Chaldeans are set in place to bring Judgment upon Judah (Hab 1:12). Yahweh's setting of Zerrubabel as a signet ring is synonymous with according him great authority (Hag 2:23). Mordecai is set over Haman's household (Esth 8:2). When Yahweh sets the lowly on high, he gives them high position (Job 5:11). The verb ʿyım is used once for appointment to a position of leadership in levitical office (2 Chron 26:10). The use of ʿyım to denote installation in an office or role tends to underscore the fact that sometimes offices and roles require the exercise of leadership one over another.

The Greek verb τιθῆμι has the idea of putting a certain thing in place, much like the Hebrew verb ʿyım. Like ʿyım, it is sometimes used to denote appointment to specific roles and offices. John 15:16 doesn't relate to the ordination of a particular group of believers, but to a role Christ in his sovereignty applies to all. Paul's appointment as preacher, apostle, and teacher is certainly not from men, though acknowledged by others reputed to be apostles (Gal 1:11-2:21).

The verb τιθῆμι is used with reference to the appointment of Israel as a light to the Gentiles (Acts 13:47). Paul speaks of the Holy Spirit as making the Ephesian elders overseers of the flock. However, the fact that the Holy Spirit is the grammatical subject suggests he does not primarily have a human ceremony in mind. Abraham is spoken of as having been appointed or put in place as the father of many nations, again a distinctly divine act (Rom 4:17). God sets different members of the body and spiritual gifts in place, as pleases him (1 Cor 12:18, 28). Paul speaks of God placing him into ministry or service (1 Tim 1:12). Paul is placed as a preacher, and apostle, and a teacher to the Gentiles (1 Tim 2:7). Christ is appointed as heir of all things (Heb 1:2).

The Language of Sanctification

The use of qdš in the Old Testament and the use of hagiazō in the New Testament show how God everyone of his people to a variety of different offices and roles. The installation comes at the commencement of the role, if not beforehand. Therefore it is not a reward for a job well done. It just is!

Intensive forms of the Hebrew verb qdš, "separating as holy," are often used to denote the appointment of people to special roles. Examples of this use with the Pi`el stem include Moses' "sanctification" or preparation of Israel as they anticipate Yahweh's self-revelation in giving the Decalogue from Sinai, the dedication of the firstborn of humans and animals to Yahweh (Exod 13:1), and the appointment of priests. However, it can also be used with reference to enemies appointed to destroy the king of Judah (Jer 22:7). The Hiph`il stem of qdš is used to depict the appointment of Jeremiah as a prophet even before his birth (Jer 1:5), and the selection of future generations of firstborn for dedication to Yahweh (Num 3:13; 8:17). Indeed, the very reason for the use of the Hiph`il rather than the Pi`el stem may be to...

indicate that the office or role assigned is in process, rather than being immediately brought into effect.\textsuperscript{18}

Like the Hebrew word \textit{qd\"{e}s}, the Greek word \textit{hagiaz\textalpha} expresses the idea of separation for a purpose. Jesus speaks of himself as being set apart and sent into the world (John 10:36) along with his disciples being set apart through God's word (John 17:17). Paul declares the Gentiles who receive Christ to have been set apart (Rom 15:16), as he does the Corinthian church (1 Cor 1:2) and the church as a whole as Christ's bride (Eph 5:26).

\textit{Appointment as a "Making"}

The language of Christ "making" the twelve to be with him and to be sent forth by him (Mark 3:14) is suggestive of appointment to office from the beginning of the time a ministry starts, not from some later time.

The King James Version once translates the verb \textit{poie\textalpha} as "ordain" with reference to human beings:

And he ordained twelve, that they should be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach (Mark 3:14).

The verb \textit{poie\textalpha} is generally translated as "do" or "make". It occasionally has the sense of assigning someone a new role or function, as here in Mark 3:13, where the idea seems to be that Jesus designated a group of twelve, corresponding to the twelve sons of Jacob and the twelve tribes of Israel, with a specific function in mind, i.e., preaching. Jesus promises to make Peter and Andrew "fishers of men" (Matt 4:19; Mark 1:17). The Jews use it to describe Jesus' making himself God (John 10:33; 19:7), and John speaks of the one who does not believe God as making him a liar (1 John 5:10).

Mark 3:14 places this "ordination" at the beginning of the disciples' ministry. The use of the verb \textit{poie\textalpha} is suggestive of appointment to office from the beginning of the time a ministry starts.

\textit{Conclusions}

The laying on of the hand(s) is biblically an actual physical act accompanying the installation to an office or task and denotes the delegation of authority and the granting of blessing. It comes at the beginning of the office or task, not long afterwards as a reward for work done. Moses laid hands upon Joshua, thus designating him as his successor. The laying on of the hand upon elders and deacons in the New Testament is an extension of the laying on of the hand upon all new believers, so the laying on of the hand cannot be confined to one subset of Christians. No distinction can be made biblically between laying on of the hand in commissioning and laying on of the hand in ordination.

Priests, kings, prophets, and promulgators of good news were anointed to office in the Old Testament. The physical act of anointing to office is not present in the New Testament. Anointing denotes the primacy and initiative of grace and divine call in appointment.

Biblically installation to office is often spoken of as causing the appointee to stand. In the case of Moses' appointment of Joshua, Moses physically stood Joshua in front of Israel. It is an act appropriately symbolizing readiness and willingness to serve.

The consecration of Old Testament priests is often described in terms of filling the hand, presumably for service. There is no evidence it was physically a part of priestly installation ceremonies, although a physical filling of the hand with emblems of grace would be an enriching addition to installation ceremonies.

The use of gift language in the context of appointment to ecclesiastical office emphasizes the wide range of offices and roles that may be involved, and celebrates celebrate the way that those fulfilling these offices and roles are a divine gift to the community.

The stretching out of the hand may or may not have been a physical act of appointment in the Old and New Testaments. However, it can appropriately be included in contemporary ceremonies of appointment as a way of indicating the appointee acts on behalf of the community.

The Hebrew language of placement denotes action under authority. The Greek language of emphasizes that divine calling comes from God. It denotes the diversity of the gifts that God has ordained in the church.

The Old and New Testament language of sanctification or separation shows how God everyone of his people to a variety of different offices and roles. The installation comes at the commencement of the role, if not beforehand. Therefore it is not a reward for a job well done. It just is!

The language of Christ "making" the twelve to be with him and to be sent forth by him (Mark 3:14) is suggestive of appointment to office from the beginning of the time a ministry starts, not from some later time.

In summary, the laying on of the hand upon an appointee to ecclesiastical office and having the candidate stand before the congregation have clear biblical precedent. A case for the congregation to stretch for the hand toward the appointee and for the appointee's hand to be filled with emblems of grace can be made. However, there is no biblical basis for a distinction between ordination and commissioning, and certainly no basis for separating ceremonies of instalment from the actual commencement of a ministry or role. Language of gift, placement, separation, and "making" can be used for the enrichment of such occasions.
